Not have been reached without crossing the Appomattox none but an engineer will ever know. When it was originally constructed it was said to be the highest bridge of its length in the country. Its length is 2,363 feet, and its height 116 feet. Until 1870 its superstructure was of wood. In that year General Mahone being president of the road, it gave place to iron and this in turn, in 1886, was followed by another iron structure—"up-to-date" in every particular. This new structure was put in place without any interruption whatever to travel. In 1896 Mr. W. A. Foreman entered upon the discharge of his duty as guard of the bridge, and with the exception of two years, when he was absent on account of ill health, he has been doing that work since. He says that during the days of the wooden bridge he was kept constantly fighting fire, and that it was not unusual to have as many as six or seven fires going on at the same time. This condition
